

The issue of broadcast media ownership has not received adequate public notification or debate. Based on the percentages of citizens relying on television and radio for all news and other information, and the major network's reluctance to provide adequate coverage of the facts, the decision should at least be delayed. Personally I would prefer the proposal be removed from the docket. There is too much ownership consolidation, very little analytical reporting and too much emphasis on advertising driven profitability. Perhaps this lack of diversity can explain the general apathy that has led to a believe anything or believe nothing public attitude.
